In today's regulatory environment, a contractor cannot afford to neglect the risk that is created by failing to know and address the environmental compliance and regulation issues that affect your business.

Regardless of whether you are a large general contractor or a small specialty contractor, and regardless of whether your work is performed on private or government property, or for a residential or commercial project - your work is subject to environmental regulation! In fact, more and more, project approval, financing and completion is being approved or rejected because of environmental regulation issues. Meaning, if you and your company do not have a fundamental understanding or what environmental problems you may encounter on a particular project, and do not have a plan to deal with those problems, you may be losing work and setting yourself up for financial disaster.

However, with some basic knowledge and pre-planning, your company can develop a system for ensuring that environmental compliance is always taken care of. Because the penalties and consequences for failing to take the simple steps necessary to identify and mitigate your environmental risks are so significant, the Associated General Contractors of Utah has prepared an industry specific presentation to inform its members of what they can and should be doing to protect their projects, their businesses and themselves from environmental hazards.
